Would someone on the messaging team make the below happen at your first opportunity? We do not need a change ticket for this.

Thank you Randy....

Kevin, when you have a sec block the domain DigitalRightsCorp.com from our mail servers.
Any email sent to your servers from this domain, just drop it. Period.. Make sense?

Randy,
I want to go forward with blocking the domain name from our servers.
OK??

We can block this on our inbound res mail servers if they are impacting our processes.

I am spamming both of you....

This company keeps trying to flood us with BS DMCA complaints. Once they get into the abuse@cox.net box, CATS just deletes them since they are not valid.

We want to just not accept anything from @DigitalRightsCorp.com. The challenge is that they use several different IP's so I do not think that blocking the IP would be the best route.

Cox.net web interface (I was checking the virus report one) has a section where you can set up a filter to delete them once they come in.

Would this work? Or would it even be the best way to do it?

They sent us 24,000 complaints in one day. Not cool!!!

So until they get their act together, we do not even want to see them or allow these complaints into the abuse@cox.net box. So many tickets really slows down the processing that CATS does after it receives the email.

Does that makes sense?

Legal is behind this.

COX

I'm fine with that plan until they work out with me a plan to comply with the law.

Thinking that maybe we need a rule to drop the mail before it even gets into the abuse@cox.net account??
They have actually talked to Randy and I have told them several times to jump off a bridge, yet the keep sending them.

Randy, anything we can do about this? Cease and desist?

Just as an FYI, we received around 24,000 complaints from these guys yesterday (all auto-deleted without ticketing). Today, we've received over 18,000 more. That may be enough to be considered "hostile".
